The most decisive experiments bearing on this question are those of Mr. Lawes. The experiments were made to determine the "comparative fattening properties of some of the most important English breeds of sheep." The breeds selected were the Sussex Down, the Hampshire Down, the Leicester, the Cotswold, and half-bred seehers and half-bred seehers and half-bred seehers and half-bred seehers and half-bred seehers. The Sussex Down, which was brought to relatives and friends, as agricus and growing evil; asserting that a woman's obligatious to her husband were greater than those to her "Eastern Cousins" and "relatives by the wife's side," and suggesting the formation of a permanent organization for mutual aid and protection, and tor the promotion of the desired reform. A baby was then brought before the seembly and received with deep emotion. The proceedings ended with singing of "Days of Absence."
